Description

The history of the Guadeloupe has been marked by a wave of immigration from India, which directly followed the abolition of slavery. This new population settled in the area, bringing with it oriental flavours and spices.

Some of the plants used in recipes have therefore been introduced from India, including the rhizomes of ginger and turmeric which today form part of Guadeloupe's culinary heritage. Partly as a result of this Indian culture, the Karupodha family business wanted to enhance this cultural identity by developing a range of products made from the spices they grow. Their original touch is in suggesting that they are taken in unusual forms. In syrups or as infusions, let yourself be seduced by the flavours of these natural products which come directly from the region of the National Park of Guadeloupe.
